University research and scholarship have intrinsic value— both in advancing our understanding of complex systems and concepts and in expanding knowledge through inquiry. The intellectual outputs of a university also have the potential to make people’s lives better and address the challenges of modern society. Innovators and entrepreneurs are problem solvers who work in this space. If you would like to explore the potential to broaden your impacts by turning groundbreaking ideas into products and services that can change the world, come join us for a Faculty Forum on Innovation Resources at UW–Madison.

From leveraging university ideas to solve global problems to finding ways to grow departmental resources and financial support, we will be sharing valuable information about the commercialization process relevant to both you and your students. Come learn about free educational programming and legal support, patents and licensing, and important university policies and procedures for UW–Madison innovators. The evening will wrap up with a presentation by Billings-Bascom Professor of Nutritional Sciences Denise Ney, who will share her experience as a serial entrepreneur and innovator.
